Not So fashionable Furs
Our fur campaign’s success and goals

It is with a great sense of pride and anticipation that I take this opportunity to announce the launching of our 1989 anti-fur campaign and to introduce our two newest spokeswomen, the outstanding actress Candice Bergen, star of TV’s “Murphy Brown”; and the beautiful and talented actress Carré Otis. Ms. Bergen says, in her HSUS radio public-service announcement, “I do not want to participate in activities that sanction cruelty”; Ms. Otis is appearing on behalf of the HSUS in a magazine advertisement, “I’ll Be Ashamed to Wear Fur” (see page 2).

Together, the sentiments of these women epitomize the nature of the HSUS anti-fur campaign. This is a campaign whose basic approach is public education. Whether the furs are obtained from wild animals or from so-called ranched animals, brutality, cruelty, and a needless waste of animal life are unavoidable. We need to educate fur-wearers and consumers that, because of this unmitigated cruelty, fur garments are no longer symbols of admiration and affluence but of shame and suffering. Fur is not chic, glamorous, cute, or enticing; it is simply cruel. The question, therefore, is whether a humane and caring society will tolerate the senseless suffering of innocent animals for the superficiality of not-so-fashionable furs. While these declines cannot totally be attributed to our campaigns, the fact is that people understand the cruelty and suffering inherent in fur coats, they will stop buying them, and when they do, the suffering will end.

I commend the courage, the compassion, and commitment of Candice Bergen, Carré Otis, television personality Bob Barker, and a host of other individuals. I commend, too, the national and international organizations that have committed their resources and their energies to ending the horror of fur. I commend the thousands of local societies and the million members of animal-protection organizations whose efforts have been instrumental in exposing the tragedy of fur. All of us, together with a public that recognizes and rejects senseless animal cruelty, are bringing an end to the tragedy of fur fashion.

For the HSUS, the fur campaign has been the largest campaign in our history. Our success last year was a fantastic beginning, but only a beginning. We must now redouble our efforts and sustain them, until the shame of fur and its cruelly ends!
